Time is one of the most valuable resources available to human beings. Unlike money or material possessions, lost time can never be recovered. Successful people understand the importance of using their time wisely. They plan their activities, set priorities, and avoid unnecessary delays. On the other hand, people who waste time often find themselves unable to complete important tasks and later regret their carelessness. Proper time management does not mean working all the time; it means making the best use of available hours while maintaining a healthy balance between work and rest. Developing the habit of valuing time from an early age can greatly improve a person's chances of achieving success in life.
